Laser TVs are the most recent iteration of projection televisions, using an optical laser rather than a mirror and lamp configuration to produce images. Laser TVs use a DLP (Digital Light Processing) chipset in single or triple chipset configurations. These chips use thousands of microscopic mirrors arranged in a rectangular array and each mirror represents a pixel on the screen. These mirrors reflect white and color light from the laser lamp to create images and turn on and off quickly to create grayscale images. The triple chipset configurations use a prism to divide the white light emitted by the laser and each primary color is sent to your Micromirror chip. This eliminates the rainbow effect, this configuration is found on high-end home laser TVs, projectors and commercial film projectors and is able to a higher number of colors for more realistic images. Hisense's 100 and 120-inch Smart Laser TV system is the best ever available model right now, with an integrated Harman Kardon audio system, a 4K resolution and an ultra-short 8-inch launch distance. Laser TVs can offer many of the same smart features of their LED counters; Some units have integrated voice controls and compatibility with virtual assistants such as Alexa and Google Assistant, Wi-Fi and Bluetooth Connectivity and streaming apps. They can also produce an excellent Full HD or 1080p 4K resolution for excellent image quality. Unfortunately, like all new technologies, all these great features have a high cost; Some models sell for almost $10,000, putting them well out of reach of most customers. This is the most common version of HDR and is available in many different brands and models. If you are looking for a higher audio quality, many new Hisense TVs also use Dolby Atmos to produce virtual virtual audio for a more engaging experience. Many TVs also have Bluetooth connectivity to set up wireless speakers, soundbar and subwoofer for a personalized home theater configuration. With Bluetooth, you can also connect wireless headphones for private listening so as not to disturb others at home or dormitory while watching your favorite shows and movies, listen to music, or play video games.
